Jia Yongting lives in Changsha, Hunan. Recently, she once again received a box full of fruit from Laizhou, Shandong. It was sent by Sun Hongzheng, an 80-year-old farmer.

In 2018, when Jia saw him at a Beijing subway station, Sun was holding an old “dumb phone” and asking for directions. Jia told him the way and asked if he had a place to stay. Sun said he didn’t. He was in the large city on his own. Jia felt sorry for Sun. She gave him 100 yuan in cash and told her phone number to him. She asked him to call her if he needed help in Beijing. As she often helps others, Jia did not think much about the kind act and quickly forgot about it.

Jia never expected that Sun would call her around two weeks later from his home. He asked her for her address so that he could send her some gifts to express his thanks. Though at the beginning Jia turned down his gift, Sun kept calling her many times. Sun’s actions finally touched Jia’s heart. Since then, Jia has received different gifts from Sun every year. And each time Sun wrote a letter and sent it to her with the gifts.

As one of the oldest traditional opera forms in China, Kunqu Opera was born in the region of Kunshan in today's Suzhou, Jiangsu province. It has a most important influence on all the more recent forms of opera in China, for example, Peking Opera.

With songs in the Suzhou dialect(方言), beautiful body movements, Kungfu and dance, Kunqu Opera uses an endless variety of gestures to express certain feelings. One of the best-known and most-performed pieces of Kunqu Opera is The Peony Pavilion, which was written by Ming Dynasty(1368-1644) play writer Tang Xianzu, who is often compared to William Shakespeare.

Kunqu Opera had once faced a competition from mass(大众) culture and a lack of interest among young people, with actors of earlier generation retiring(退休), audiences getting old and fewer young people willing to learn and enjoy the old art.

In 2003, Kunqu Opera had a sudden increase of the audience and 70% of them were young people. The youth version(版本) of The Peony Pavilion is considered a major contributor to the development and popularity of the art form. Till now, the youth version has been seen by a worldwide audience of about 800,000. And this year, it will be staged at Beijing Tianqiao Performing Arts Centre.
